A Comprehensive Public Policy Platform on Flexible Work Arrangements

12 pm – 1 pm
The National Press Club
(Lunch will be served)

On Wednesday, May 13, Workplace Flexibility 2010, a Georgetown Law-based think tank, will release a comprehensive set of policy solutions to expand Americans' access to flexible work arrangements such as compressed workweeks, predictable schedules, and telecommuting.

The report represents the culmination of a five-year process of listening to employer, employee and consumer representatives – and provides a detailed blueprint for the White House, Congress and other policymakers to build on innovative workplace flexibility strategies. It also provides numerous examples of effective business practices, and comes on the heels of First Lady Michelle Obama's challenge to find ways to encourage employers to provide more flexibility to employees.

A consensus statement from members of a bipartisan National Advisory Commission on Workplace Flexibility accompanies the report. Commission members – a politically diverse group of business, labor, and consumer representatives, former high-level government officials, and academic researchers – agree that Americans across all professions and income levels need greater access to workplace flexibility.

Workplace flexibility is essential to making America's 21st century workforce strong and productive – and is a key priority for the White House Task Force on Middle Class Working Families and First Lady Michelle Obama's Office. Flexibility supports employees who struggle to meet the demands of work while also fulfilling personal responsibilities – caregiving for a loved one, volunteering, attending religious services, or obtaining job training. At the same time, flexibility helps employers support their workforce, meet their business objectives, and increase their competitive advantage.
